CHAPTER XII.

THE WOOING OF MASTER FOX*.

You are aware, my dear Nymphalin, that in the time of which I am about to speak, there was no particular enmity between the various species of brutes; the dog and the hare chatted very agreeably together, and all the world knows that the wolf, unacquainted with mutton, had a particular affection for the lamb. In these happy days, two most respectable cats, of very old family, had an only daughter; never was kitten more amiable, or more seducing; as she grew up she manifested so many charms, that she in a little while became noted as the greatest beauty in the neighbourhood; need I to you, dearest Nymphalin, describe

---

* In the excursions of the Fairies, it is the object of the author, to bring before the reader a rapid phantasmagoria of the various beings that belong to the German superstitions, so that the work may thus describe the outer and the inner world of the land of the Rhine. The tale of the Fox's Wooing has been composed to give the English reader an idea of a species of novel not naturalised amongst us, though frequent among the legends of our Irish neighbours; in which the brutes are the only characters drawn—drawn too, with all nice and subtle shades of distinction, and with as much variety of traits as if they were the creatures of the civilised world.

her perfections. Suffice it to say that her skin was of the most delicate tortoise-shell, that her paws were smoother than velvet, that her whiskers were twelve inches long at the least, and that her eyes had a gentleness altogether astonishing in a cat. But if the young beauty had suitors in plenty during the lives of Monsieur and Madame, you may suppose the number was not diminished, when, at the age of two years and a half, she was left an orphan, and sole heiress to all the hereditary property. In fine, she was the richest marriage in the whole country. Without troubling you, dearest Queen, with the adventures of the rest of her lovers, with their suit, and their rejection, I come at once to the two rivals most sanguine of success;—the Dog and the Fox.

Now the Dog was a handsome, honest, straightforward, affectionate fellow; “For my part,” said he, “I don’t wonder at my cousin’s refusing Bruin the bear, and Gauntgrim the wolf; to be sure they give themselves great airs, and call themselves ‘noble,’ but what then? Bruin is always in the sulks, and Gauntgrim always in a passion; a cat of any sensibility would lead a miserable life with them: as for me, I am very good tempered when I’m not put out; and I have no fault except that of being angry if disturbed at my meals. I am young and good-looking, fond of play and amusement, and altogether as agreeable a husband as a cat could find in a summer’s day. If she marries me, well and good; she may have her property settled on herself— if not, I shall bear her no malice; and I hope I shan’t be too much in love to forget that there are other cats in the world."

With that the Dog threw his tail over his back, and set off to his mistress with a gay face on the matter.

Now the Fox heard the Dog talking thus to himself—for the Fox was always peeping about, in holes and corners, and he burst out a-laughing when the Dog was out of sight.

"Ho, ho, my fine fellow," said he, "not so fast, if you please; you've got the Fox for a rival, let me tell you."

The Fox, as you very well know, is a beast that can never do any thing without a manœuvre; and as, from his cunning, he was generally very lucky in any thing he undertook, he did not doubt for a moment that he should put the Dog's nose out of joint. Reynard was aware that in love one should always, if possible, be the first in the field, and he therefore resolved to get the start of the Dog and arrive before him at the Cat's residence. But this was no easy matter; for though Reynard could run faster than the Dog for a little way, he was no match for him in a journey of some distance. "However," said Reynard, "those good natured creatures are never very wise; and I think I know already what will make him bait on his way."

With that, the Fox trotted pretty fast by a short cut in the woods, and getting before the Dog, laid himself down by a hole in the earth and began to howl most piteously.

The Dog, hearing the noise, was very much alarmed; "See now," said he, "if the poor Fox has not got himself into some scrape. Those cunning creatures are always in mischief; thank heaven, it never comes into my head to be cunning." And the good-natured animal ran off as hard as he could to see what was the matter with the Fox.

"Oh dear!" cried Reynard; "what shall I do, what shall I do! my poor little sister has gotten into this hole, and I can't get her out—she'll certainly be smothered." And the Fox burst out a-howling more piteously than before.

"But my dear Reynard," quoth the Dog very simply, "why don't you go in after your sister?"

"Ah, you may well ask that," said the Fox; "but, in trying to get in, don't you perceive that I have sprained my back, and can't stir; oh dear! what shall I do if my poor little sister gets smothered."

"Pray don't vex yourself," said the Dog; "I'll get her out in an instant;" and with that he forced himself with great difficulty into the hole.

Now no sooner did the Fox see that the Dog was fairly in, than he rolled a great stone to the mouth of the hole, and fitted it so tight, that the Dog not being able to turn round and scratch against it with his fore-paws, was made a close prisoner.

"Ha, ha," cried Reynard laughing outside; "amuse yourself with my poor little sister, while I go and make your compliments to Mademoiselle the Cat."

With that Reynard set off at an easy pace, never troubling his head what became of the poor Dog. When he arrived in the neighbourhood of the beautiful Cat's mansion, he resolved to pay a visit to a friend of his, an old Magpie that lived in a tree, and was well acquainted with all the news of the place. "For," thought Reynard, "I may as well know the weak side of my mistress that is to be, and get round it at once."

The Magpie received the Fox with great cordiality, and inquired what brought him so great a distance from home.

"Upon my word," said the Fox, "nothing so much as the pleasure of seeing your ladyship, and hearing those agreeable anecdotes you tell with so charming a grace; but, to let you into a secret—be sure it don't go farther"—

"On the word of a Magpie," interrupted the bird.

"Pardon me for doubting you," continued the Fox; "I should have recollected that a Pie was a proverb for discretion; but, as I was saying, you know her majesty the Lioness."

"Surely," said the Magpie bridling.

"Well; she was pleased to fall in—that is to say—to—take a caprice to your humble servant, and the Lion grew so jealous that I thought it prudent to decamp; a jealous Lion is no joke, let me assure your ladyship. But mum's the word."

So great a piece of news delighted the Magpie. She could not but repay it in kind, by all the news in her budget. She told the Fox all the scandal about Bruin and Gauntgrim, and she then fell to work on the poor young Cat. She did not spare her foibles, you may be quite sure. The Fox listened with great attention, and he learnt enough to convince him, that however the Magpie exaggerated, the Cat was very susceptible to flattery, and had a great deal of imagination.

When the Magpie had finished, she said, "But it must be very unfortunate for you to be banished from so magnificent a court as that of the Lion."

"As to that," answered the Fox, "I consoled myself for my exile, with a present his majesty made me on parting, as a reward for my anxiety for his honour and domestic tranquillity; namely, three hairs from the fifth leg of the Amoronthologosphorus. Only think of that, Ma'am."

"The what?" cried the Pie, cocking down her left ear.

"The Amoronthologosphorus."

"La!" said the Magpie, "and what is that very long word, my dear Reynard?"

"The Amoronthologosphorus is a beast that lives on the other side of the river Cylinx, it has five legs, and on the fifth leg there are three hairs, and whoever has those three hairs, can be young and beautiful for ever."

"Bless me: I wish you would let me see them," said the Pie, holding out her claw.

"Would that I could oblige you, Ma'am, but it's as much as my life's worth to show them to any but the lady I marry. In fact, they only have an effect on the fair sex, as you may see by myself, whose poor person they utterly fail to improve; they are, therefore, intended for a marriage present, and his majesty, the Lion, thus generously atoned to me for relinquishing the tenderness of his queen. One must confess that there was a great deal of delicacy in the gift. But you'll be sure not to mention it."

"A Magpie gossip, indeed!" quoth the old blab.

"The Fox then wished the Magpie good night, and retired to a hole to sleep off the fatigues of the day, before he presented himself to the beautiful young Cat.

The next morning, heaven knows how, it was all over the place, that Reynard the Fox had been banished from court for the favour shown him by her majesty, and that the Lion had bribed his departure with three hairs that would make any lady, whom the Fox married, young and beautiful for ever.

The Cat was the first to learn the news, and she became all curiosity to see so interesting a stranger, possessed of "qualifications" which, in the language of the day, "would render any animal happy!" She was not long without obtaining her wish. As she was taking a walk in the wood the Fox contrived to encounter her. You may be sure that he made her his best bow; and he flattered the poor maid with so courtly an air that she saw nothing surprising in the love of the Lioness.

Meanwhile let us see what became of his rival, the Dog.

Ah, the poor creature! said Nymphalin; it is easy to guess that he need not be buried alive to lose all chance of marrying the heiress.

Wait till the end, answered Fayzenheim. When the Dog found that he was thus entrapped, he gave himself up for lost. In vain he kicked with his hind-legs against the stone, he only succeeded in bruising his paws, and at length he was forced to lie down, with his tongue out of his mouth, and quite exhausted. "However," said he, after he had taken breath, "it won't do to be starved here, without doing my best to escape; and if I can't get out one way, let me see if there is not a hole at the other end;" thus saying, his courage, which stood him in lieu of cunning, returned, and he proceeded on with the same straightforward way in which he always conducted himself. At first the path was exceedingly narrow, and he hurt his sides very much against the rough stones that projected from the earth. But by degrees the way became broader, and he now went on with considerable ease to himself, till he arrived in a large cavern, where he saw an immense Griffin sitting on his tail, and smoking a huge pipe.

The Dog was by no means pleased at meeting so suddenly a creature that had only to open his mouth to swallow him up at a morsel; however he put a bold face on the danger, and walking respectfully up to the Griffin, said, "Sir, I should be very much obliged to you if you would inform me the way out of these holes into the upper world."

The Griffin took the pipe out of his mouth, and looked at the Dog very sternly.

"Ho! wretch," said he, "how comest thou hither? I suppose thou wantest to steal my treasure; but I know how to treat such vagabonds as you, and I shall certainly eat you up."

"You can do that if you choose," said the Dog, "but it would be very unhandsome conduct in an animal so much bigger than myself. For my own part, I never attack any dog that is not of equal size. I should be ashamed of myself if I did; and as to your treasure, the character I bear for honesty is too well known to merit such a suspicion."

"Upon my word," said the Griffin, who could not help smiling for the life of him, "you have a singularly free mode of expressing yourself;—and how, I say, came you hither?"

Then the Dog, who did not know what a lie was, told the Griffin his whole history, how he had set off to pay his court to the Cat, and how Reynard the Fox had entrapped him into the hole.

When he had finished, the Griffin said to him, "I see, my friend, that you know how to speak the truth; I am in want of just such a servant as you will make me, therefore stay with me and keep watch over my treasure when I sleep."

"Two words to that," said the Dog. "You have hurt my feelings very much by suspecting my honesty, and I would much sooner go back into the wood and be avenged on that scoundrel the Fox, than serve a master who has so ill an opinion of me; even if he gave me to keep, much less to take care of, all the treasures in the world. I pray you, therefore, to dismiss me, and to put me in the right way to my cousin the Cat."

"I am not a Griffin of many words," answered the master of the cavern, "and I give you your choice—be my servant, or be my breakfast; it is just the same to me. I give you time to decide till I have smoked out my pipe."

The poor Dog did not take so long to consider. "It is true," thought he, "that it is a great misfortune to live in a cave with a Griffin of so unpleasant a countenance; but, probably, if I serve him well and faithfully, he'll take pity on me some day, and let me go back to earth, and prove to my cousin what a rogue the Fox is; and as to the rest, though I would sell my life as dear as I could, it is impossible to fight a Griffin with a mouth of so monstrous a size;"—in short, he decided to stay with the Griffin.

"Shake a paw on it," quoth the grim smoker; and the Dog shook paws.

"And now," said the Griffin, "I will tell you what you are to do—look here; and, moving his tail, he showed the Dog a great heap of gold and silver, in a hole in the ground, that he had covered with the folds of his tail; and, also, what the Dog thought more valuable, a great heap of bones of very tempting appearance.

"Now," said the Griffin, "during the day, I can take very good care of these myself; but at night it is very necessary that I should go to sleep; so when I sleep, you must watch over them instead of me."

"Very well," said the Dog; "as to the gold and silver I have no objection; but I would much rather you would lock up the bones, for I'm often hungry of a night, and—"

"Hold your tongue," said the Griffin.

“But, sir,” said the Dog, after a short silence, “surely nobody ever comes into so retired a situation. Who are the thieves, if I may make bold to ask?”

“Know,” answered the Griffin, “that there are a great many serpents in this neighbourhood, and they are always trying to steal my treasure; and, if they catch me napping, they, not contented with theft, would do their best to sting me to death. So that I am almost worn out for want of sleep.”

“Ah!” quoth the Dog, who was fond of a good night’s rest, “I don’t envy you your treasure, sir.”

At night, the Griffin, who had a great deal of penetration, and saw that he might depend on the Dog, laid down to sleep in another corner of the cave; and the Dog, shaking himself well, so as to be quite awake, took watch over the treasure. His mouth watered exceedingly at the bones, and he could not help smelling them now and then; but he said to himself,—“A bargain’s a bargain, and since I have promised to serve the Griffin, I must serve him as an honest Dog ought to serve.”

In the middle of the night, he saw a great snake creeping in by the side of the cave, but the Dog set up so loud a bark, that the Griffin awoke, and the snake crept away as fast as he could. Then the Griffin was very much pleased, and he gave the Dog one of the bones to amuse himself with; and every night the Dog watched the treasure, and acquitted himself so well, that not a snake, at last, dared to make its appearance;—so the Griffin enjoyed an excellent night’s rest.

The Dog now found himself much more comfortable than he expected. The Griffin regularly gave him one of the bones for supper; and, pleased with his fidelity, made himself as agreeable a master as a Griffin could do. Still, however, the Dog was secretly very anxious to return to earth; for having nothing to do during the day, but to doze on the ground, he dreamt perpetually of his cousin the Cat's charms; and, in fancy, he gave the rascal Reynard as hearty a worry as a Fox may well have the honour of receiving from a Dog's paws. He awoke panting—alas! he could not realise his dreams.

One night, as he was watching as usual over the treasure, he was greatly surprised to see a beautiful little black and white dog enter the cave; and it came fawning to our honest friend, wagging its tail with pleasure.

“Ah! little one,” said our Dog, whom, to distinguish, I will call the watch-Dog, “you had better make the best of your way back again. See, there is a great Griffin asleep in the other corner of the cave, and if he wakes, he will either eat you up, or make you his servant as he has made me.”

“I know what you would tell me,” says the little Dog; “and I have come down here to deliver you. The stone is now gone from the mouth of the cave, and you have nothing to do but to go back with me. Come, brother, come.”

The Dog was very much excited by this address. “Don't ask me, my dear little friend,” said he, “you must be aware that I should be too happy to escape out of this cold cave, and roll on the soft turf once more; but if I leave my master, the Griffin, those cursed serpents, who are always on the watch, will come in and steal his treasure—nay, perhaps, sting him to death." Then the little Dog came up to the watch-Dog, and remonstrated with him greatly, and licked him caressingly on both sides of his face; and, taking him by the ear, endeavoured to draw him from the treasure, but the Dog would not stir a step, though his heart sorely pressed him. At length the little Dog, finding it all in vain, said, "Well then, if I must leave, good-bye; but I have become so hungry in coming down all this way after you, that I wish you would give me one of those bones; they smell very pleasantly, and one out of so many could never be missed."

"Alas," said the watch-Dog, with tears in his eyes, "how unlucky I am to have eat up the bone my master gave me, otherwise you should have had it and welcome. But I can't give you one of these, because my master has made me promise to watch over them all, and I have given him my paw on it. I am sure a dog of your respectable appearance will say nothing farther on the subject."

Then the little dog answered pettishly, "Pooh, what nonsense you talk; surely a great Griffin can't miss a little bone, fit for me;" and nestling his nose under the watch-Dog, he tried forthwith to bring up one of the bones.

On this the watch-Dog grew angry, and, though with much reluctance, he seized the little Dog by the nape of the neck and threw him off, though without hurting him. Suddenly the little dog changed into a monstrous serpent, bigger even than the Griffin himself, and the watch-Dog barked with all his might. The Griffin rose in a great hurry, and the Serpent sprang upon him ere he was well awake. I wish, dearest Nymphalin, you could have seen the battle between the Griffin and the Serpent, how they coiled and twisted, and bit and darted their fiery tongues at each other. At length, the Serpent got uppermost, and was about to plunge his tongue into that part of the Griffin which is unprotected by his scales, when the Dog, seizing him by the tail, bit him so sharply, that he could not help turning round to kill his new assailant, and the Griffin, taking advantage of the opportunity, caught the Serpent by the throat with both claws, and fairly strangled him. As soon as the Griffin had recovered from the nervousness of the conflict, he heaped all manner of caresses on the Dog for saving his life. The Dog told him the whole story, and the Griffin then explained, that the dead snake was the King of the Serpents, who had the power to change himself into any shape he pleased. "If he had tempted you," said he, "to leave the treasure but for one moment, or to have given him any part of it, ay, but a single bone, he would have crushed you in an instant, and stung me to death ere I could have waked; but none, no not the most venomous thing in creation, has power to hurt the honest!"

"That has always been my belief," answered the Dog; "and now, sir, you had better go to sleep again, and leave the rest to me."

"Nay," answered the Griffin, "I have no longer need of a servant, for now that the King of the Serpents is dead, the rest will never molest me. It was only to satisfy his avarice that his subjects dared to brave the den of the Griffin."

Upon hearing this the Dog was exceedingly delighted; and raising himself on his hind-paws, he begged the Griffin most movingly to let him return to earth, to visit his mistress, the Cat, and worry his rival, the Fox.

"You do not serve an ungrateful master," answered the Griffin. "You shall return, and I will teach you all the craft of our race, which is much craftier than the race of that pettifogger the Fox, so that you may be able to cope with your rival."

"Ah, excuse me," said the Dog, hastily, "I am equally obliged to you; but I fancy honesty is a match for cunning any day; and I think myself a great deal safer in being a dog of honour than if I knew all the tricks in the world."

"Well," said the Griffin, a little piqued at the Dog's bluntness, "do as you please; I wish you all possible success."

Then the Griffin opened a secret door in the side of the cavern, and the Dog saw a broad path that led at once into the wood. He thanked the Griffin with all his heart, and ran wagging his tail into the open moonlight. "Ah, ah! master Fox," said he, "there's no trap for an honest Dog that has not two doors to it, cunning as you think yourself."

With that he curled his tail gallantly over his left leg, and set off on a long trot to the Cat's house. When he was within sight of it, he stopped to refresh himself by a Magpie.

"And what do you want, friend?" said she, rather disdainfully, for the Dog looked somewhat out of case after his journey.

"I am going to see my cousin the Cat," answered he.

"Your cousin! marry come up," said the Magpie; "don't you know she is going to be married to Reynard the Fox. This is not a time for her to receive the visits of a brute like you."

These words put the Dog in such a passion, that he very nearly bit the Magpie for her uncivil mode of communicating such bad news. However he curbed his temper, and, without answering her, went at once to the Cat's residence.

The Cat was sitting at the window, and no sooner did the Dog see her than he fairly lost his heart; never had he seen so charming a Cat before; he advanced, wagging his tail, and with his most insinuating air; when the Cat, getting up, clapped the window in his face—and lo! Reynard the Fox appeared in her stead.

"Come out, thou rascal!" said the Dog, showing his teeth; "come out, I challenge thee to single combat; I have not forgiven thy malice, and thou seest that I am no longer shut up in the cave, and unable to punish thee for thy wickedness."

"Go home, silly one;" answered the Fox, sneering; "thou hast no business here, and as for fighting thee—Bah!" Then the Fox left the window and disappeared. But the Dog, thoroughly enraged, scratched lustily at the door, and made such a noise, that presently the Cat herself came to the window.

"How now!" said she, angrily; "what means all this rudeness? who are you, and what do you want at my house?"

"O, my dear cousin," said the Dog, "do not speak so severely; know that I have come here on purpose to pay you a visit; and whatever you do, let me beseech you not to listen to that villain Reynard, you have no conception what a rogue he is!"

"What," said the Cat, blushing, "do you dare to abuse your betters in this fashion. I see you have a design on me. Go, this instant, or——"

"Enough, Madam;" said the Dog, proudly; "you need not speak twice to me—farewell."

And he turned away very slowly, and went under a tree, where he took up his lodgings for the night. But the next morning there was an amazing commotion in the neighbourhood; a stranger, of a very different style of travelling from that of the Dog, had arrived at the dead of the night, and fixed his abode in a large cavern, hollowed out of a steep rock. The noise he had made in flying through the air was so great, that it had awakened every bird and beast in the parish; and Reynard, whose bad conscience never suffered him to sleep very soundly, putting his head out of the window, perceived, to his great alarm, that the stranger was nothing less than a monstrous Griffin.

Now the Griffins are the richest beasts in the world; and that's the reason they keep so close under ground. Whenever it does happen that they pay a visit above, it is not a thing to be easily forgotten.

The Magpie was all agitation,—what could the Griffin possibly want there. She resolved to take a peep at the cavern, and accordingly she hopped timorously up the rock, and pretended to be picking up sticks for her nest.

“Hollo, Ma'am,” cried a very rough voice, and she saw the Griffin putting his head out of the cavern. “Hollo, you are the very lady I want to see; you know all the people about here—eh?”

“All the best company, your Lordship, I certainly do,” answered the Magpie, dropping a curtsey.

Upon this the Griffin walked out; and smoking his pipe leisurely in the open air, in order to set the Pie at her ease, continued—

“Are there any respectable beasts of good family settled in this neighbourhood?”

“O most elegant society, I assure your Lordship,” cried the Pie. “I have lived here myself these ten years, and the great heiress, the Cat yonder, attracts a vast number of strangers.”

“Humph—heiress, indeed! much you know about heiresses!” said the Griffin. “There is only one heiress in the world, and that's my daughter.”

“Bless me, has your Lordship a family? I beg you a thousand pardons. But I only saw your Lordship's own equipage last night, and did not know you brought any one with you."

"My daughter went first, and was safely lodged before I arrived. She did not disturb you, I dare say, as I did; for she sails along like a swan; but I have the gout in my left claw, and that's the reason I puff and groan so in taking a journey."

"Shall I drop in upon Miss Griffin, and see how she is after her journey?" said the Pie, advancing.

"I thank you, no; I don't intend her to be seen while I stay here, it unsettles her; and I'm afraid of the young beasts running away with her if they once heard how handsome she was; she's the living picture of me, but she's monstrous giddy! Not that I should care much if she did go off with a beast of degree, were I not obliged to pay her portion, which is prodigious, and I don't like parting with money, Ma'am, when I've once got it. Ho, ho, ho!"

"You are too witty, my Lord. But if you refused your consent?" said the Pie, anxious to know the whole family history of so grand a seigneur.

"I should have to pay the dowry all the same. It was left her by her uncle the Dragon. But don't let this go any farther."

"Your Lordship may depend on my secrecy. I wish your Lordship a very good morning."

Away flew the Pie, and she did not stop till she got to the Cat's house. The Cat and the Fox were at breakfast, and the Fox had his paw on his heart. "Beautiful scene!"

cried the Pie; the Cat coloured, and bade the Pie take a seat.

Then off went the Pie's tongue, glib, glib, glib, chatter, chatter, chatter. She related to them the whole story of the Griffin and his daughter, and a great deal more beside, that the Griffin had never told her.

The Cat listened attentively. Another young heiress in the neighbourhood might be a formidable rival. "But is the Griffiness handsome?" said she.

"Handsome!" cried the Pie; "oh! if you could have seen the father!—such a mouth, such eyes, such a complexion, and he declares she's the living picture of himself! But what do you say, Mr. Reynard; you, who have been so much in the world, have, perhaps, seen the young lady?"

"Why, I can't say I have," answered the Fox, waking from a reverie; "but she must be wonderfully rich. I dare say that fool, the Dog, will be making up to her."

"Ah! by the way," said the Pie, "what a fuss he made at your door yesterday; why would not you admit him, my dear?"

"Oh!" said the Cat, demurely, "Mr. Reynard says that he is a Dog of very bad character, quite a fortune-hunter; and hiding the most dangerous disposition to bite under an appearance of good nature. I hope he won't be quarrelsome with you, dear Reynard."

"With me! O the poor wretch, no!—he might bluster a little; but he knows that if I'm once angry I'm a devil at biting;—but one should not boast of one's self."

In the evening Reynard felt a strange desire to go and see the Griffin smoking his pipe; but what could he do? There was the Dog under the opposite tree evidently watching for him, and Reynard had no wish to prove himself that devil at biting which he declared he was. At last he resolved to have recourse to stratagem to get rid of the Dog.

A young Buck of a Rabbit, a sort of provincial fop, had looked in upon his cousin the Cat, to pay her his respects, and Reynard, taking him aside, said, "You see that shabby-looking Dog under the tree. Well, he has behaved very ill to your cousin the Cat, and you certainly ought to challenge him—forgive my boldness—nothing but respect for your character induces me to take so great a liberty; you know I would chastise the rascal myself, but what a scandal it would make! If I were already married to your cousin, it would be a different thing. But you know what a story that cursed Magpie would hatch out of it!"

The Rabbit looked very foolish: he assured the Fox that he was no match for the Dog; that he was very fond of his cousin to be sure; but he saw no necessity to interfere with her domestic affairs;—and, in short, he tried all he possibly could to get out of the scrape; but the Fox so artfully played on his vanity—so earnestly assured him that the Dog was the biggest coward in the world, and would make a humble apology, and so eloquently represented to him the glory he would obtain for manifesting so much spirit, that at length the Rabbit was persuaded to go out and deliver the challenge.

You go first, I'll follow in half an hour—and I say—hark!—in case he does accept the challenge, and you feel the least afraid, I'll be in the field, and take it off your paws with the utmost pleasure; rely on me, my dear sir!"

Away went the Rabbit. The Dog was a little astonished at the temerity of the poor creature; but on hearing that the Fox was to be present, willingly consented to repair to the place of conflict. This readiness the Rabbit did not at all relish; he went very slowly to the field, and seeing no Fox there, his heart misgave him, and while the Dog was putting his nose to the ground to try if he could track the coming of the Fox, the Rabbit slipped into a burrow, and left the Dog to walk back again.

Meanwhile the Fox was already at the rock; he walked very soft-footedly, and looked about with extreme caution, for he had a vague notion that a Griffin Papa would not be very civil to Foxes.

Now there were two holes in the rock, one below, one above, an upper story and an under; and while the Fox was peering out, he saw a great claw from the upper rock beckoning to him.

"Ah, ah!" said the Fox, "that's the wanton young Griffiness, I'll swear."

He approached, and a voice said—

"Charming Mr. Reynard! Do you not think you could deliver an unfortunate Griffiness from a barbarous confinement in this rock?"

"Oh heavens!" cried the Fox, tenderly, "what a beautiful voice! and, ah, my poor heart, what a lovely claw! Is it possible that I hear the daughter of my lord, the great Griffin?"

"Hush, flatterer! not so loud if you please. My father is taking an evening stroll, and is very quick of hearing. He has tied me up by my poor wings in the cavern, for he is mightily afraid of some beast running away with me. You know I have all my fortune settled on myself."

"Talk not of fortune," said the Fox; "but how can I deliver you? Shall I enter and gnaw the cord?"

"Alas!" answered the Griffiness, "it is an immense chain I am bound with. However, you may come in and talk more at your ease."

The Fox peeped cautiously all round, and seeing no sign of the Griffin, he entered the lower cave and stole up stairs to the upper story; but as he went on, he saw immense piles of jewels and gold, and all sorts of treasure, so that the old Griffin might well have laughed at the poor Cat being called an heiress. The Fox was greatly pleased at such indisputable signs of wealth, and he entered the upper cave, resolved to be transported with the charms of the Griffiness.

There was, however, a great chasm between the landing place and the spot where the young lady was chained, and he found it impossible to pass; the cavern was very dark, but he saw enough of the figure of the Griffiness to perceive, in spite of her petticoat, that she was the image of her father, and the most hideous heiress that the earth ever saw!

However, he swallowed his disgust, and poured forth such a heap of compliments that the Griffiness appeared entirely won. He implored her to fly with him the first moment she was unchained.

"That is impossible," said she, "for my father never unchains me except in his presence, and then I cannot stir out of his sight."

"The wretch!" cried Reynard, "what is to be done?"

"Why, there is only one thing I know of," answered the Griffiness, "which is this—I always make his soup for him, and if I could mix something in it that would put him fast to sleep before he had time to chain me up again, I might slip down and carry off all the treasure below on my back."

"Charming!" exclaimed Reynard, "what invention! what wit! I will go and get some poppies directly."

"Alas!" said the Griffiness, "poppies have no effect upon Griffins; the only thing that can ever put my father fast to sleep is a nice young cat boiled up in his soup; it is astonishing what a charm that has upon him. But where to get a cat? it must be a maiden cat too!"

Reynard was a little startled at so singular an opiate. "But," thought he, "Griffins are not like the rest of the world, and so rich an heiress is not to be won by ordinary means."

"I do know a cat, a maiden cat," said he, after a short pause, "but I feel a little repugnance at the thought of having her boiled in the Griffin's soup. Would not a dog do as well?"

"Ah, base thing!" said the Griffiness, appearing to weep, "you are in love with the Cat, I see it; go and marry her, poor dwarf that she is, and leave me to die of grief."

In vain the Fox protested that he did not care a straw for the Cat; nothing could now appease the Griffiness, but his positive assurance that, come what would, poor puss should be brought to the cave, and boiled for the Griffin's soup.

"But how will you get her here?" said the Griffiness.

"Ah, leave that to me," said Reynard. "Only put a basket out of the window, and draw it up by a cord; the moment it arrives at the window, be sure to clap your claw on the Cat at once, for she is terribly active."

"Tush!" answered the heiress, "a pretty Griffiness I should be if I did not know how to catch a cat!"

"But this must be when your father is out?" said Reynard.

"Certainly, he takes a stroll every evening at sunset."

"Let it be to-morrow, then," said Reynard, impatient for the treasure.

This being arranged, Reynard thought it time to decamp; he stole down the stairs again, and tried to filch some of the treasure by the way, but it was too heavy for him to carry, and he was forced to acknowledge to himself that it was impossible to get the treasure without taking the Griffiness (whose back seemed prodigiously strong) into the bargain.

He returned home to the Cat, and when he entered her house, and saw how ordinary every thing looked after the jewels in the Griffin's cave, he quite wondered how he had ever thought the Cat had the least pretensions to good looks.

However, he concealed his wicked design, and his mistress thought he had never appeared so amiable.

"Only guess," said he, "where I have been? to our new neighbour the Griffin, a most charming person, thoroughly affable, and quite the air of the court. As for that silly Magpie, the Griffin saw her character at once; and it was all a hoax about his daughter; he has no daughter at all. You know, my dear, hoaxing is a fashionable amusement among the great. He says he has heard of nothing but your beauty, and on my telling him we were going to be married, he has insisted upon giving a great ball and supper in honour of the event. In fact he is a gallant old fellow and dying to see you. Of course I was obliged to accept the invitation."

"You could not do otherwise," said the unsuspecting young creature, who, as I before said, was very susceptible to flattery.

"And only think how delicate his attentions are," said the Fox. "As he is very badly lodged for a beast of his rank, and his treasure takes up the whole of the ground floor, he is forced to give the fête in the upper story, so he hangs out a basket for his guests, and draws them up with his own claw. How condescending! But the great are so amiable!"

The Cat, brought up in seclusion, was all delight at the idea of seeing such high life, and the lovers talked of nothing else all the next day. When Reynard, towards evening, putting his head out of the window, saw his old friend the Dog lying as usual and watching him very grimly, "Ah, that cursed creature, I had quite forgotten him; what is to be done now? he would make no bones of me if he once saw me set foot out of doors."

With that, the Fox began to cast in his head how he should get rid of his rival, and at length he resolved on a very notable project; he desired the Cat to set out first and wait for him at a turn in the road a little way off. "For," said he, "if we go together we shall certainly be insulted by the Dog; and he will know that, in the presence of a lady, the custom of a beast of my fashion will not suffer me to avenge the affront. But when I am alone, the creature is such a coward that he would not dare say his soul's his own; leave the door open and I'll follow directly."

The Cat's mind was so completely poisoned against her cousin that she implicitly believed this account of his character, and accordingly, with many recommendations to her lover not to sully his dignity by getting into any sort of quarrel with the Dog, she set off first.

The Dog went up to her very humbly, and begged her to allow him to say a few words to her; but she received him so haughtily, that his spirit was up; and he walked

So he walked briskly in at the back door. He was greatly surprised to find Reynard lying down in the straw, panting as if his heart would break, and rolling his eyes in the pangs of death.

"Ah, friend," said the Fox, with a faltering voice, "you are avenged, my hour is come; I am just going to give up the ghost; put your paw upon mine, and say you forgive me."

Despite his anger, the generous Dog could not set tooth on a dying foe.

"You have served me a shabby trick," said he; "you have left me to starve in a hole, and you have evidently maligned me with my cousin: certainly I meant to be avenged on you; but if you are really dying, that alters the affair."

"Oh, oh!" groaned the Fox very bitterly; "I am past help; the poor Cat is gone for Doctor Ape, but he'll never come in time. What a thing it is to have a bad conscience on one's deathbed. But, wait till the Cat returns, and I'll do you full justice with her before I die."

The good-natured Dog was much moved at seeing his mortal enemy in such a state, and endeavoured as well as he could to console him.

"Oh, oh!" said the Fox, "I am so parched in the throat, I am burning;" and he hung his tongue out of his mouth, and rolled his eyes more fearfully than ever.

"Is there no water here?" said the Dog, looking round.

"Alas, no!—yet stay—yes, now I think of it, there is some in that little hole in the wall; but how to get at it—it is so high; that I can't, in my poor weak state, climb up to it; and I dare not ask such a favour of one I have injured so much."

"Don't talk of it," said the Dog; "but the hole's very small, I could not put my nose through it."

"No; but if you just climb up on that stone, and thrust your paw into the hole, you can dip it into the water, and so cool my poor parched mouth. Oh, what a thing it is to have a bad conscience!"

The Dog sprang upon the stone, and, getting on his hind-legs, thrust his front paw into the hole; when suddenly Reynard pulled a string that he had concealed under the straw, and the Dog found his paw caught tight to the wall in a running noose.

"Ah, rascal," said he turning round; but the Fox leapt up gaily from the straw, and fastening the string with his teeth to a nail in the other end of the wall, walked out, crying, "Good-by, my dear friend; have a care how you believe hereafter in sudden conversions!"—So he left the Dog on his hind-legs to take care of the house.

Reynard found the Cat waiting for him where he had appointed, and they walked lovingly together till they came to the cave; it was now dark, and they saw the basket waiting below; the Fox assisted the poor Cat into it. "There is only room for one," said he, "you must go first!" up rose the basket; the Fox heard a piteous mew, and no more.

"So much for the Griffin's soup!" thought he.

He waited patiently for some time, when the Griffiness, waving her claw from the window, said cheerfully, "All's right, my dear Reynard; my papa has finished his soup, and sleeps as sound as a rock! All the noise in the world would not wake him now, till he has slept off the boiled Cat—which won't be these twelve hours. Come and assist me in packing up the treasure, I should be sorry to leave a single diamond behind."

"So should I," quoth the Fox; "stay, I'll come round by the lower hole: why, the door's shut! pray, beautiful Griffiness, open it to thy impatient adorer."

"Alas, my father has hid the key! I never know where he places it, you must come up by the basket; see, I let it down for you."

The Fox was a little loth to trust himself in the same conveyance that had taken his mistress to be boiled; but the most cautious grow rash when money's to be gained, and avarice can trap even a Fox. So he put himself as comfortably as he could into the basket, and up he went in an instant. It rested, however, just before it reached the window, and the Fox felt, with a slight shudder, the claw of the Griffiness stroking his back.

"Oh, what a beautiful coat," quoth she, caressingly.

“ You are too kind,” said the Fox, “ but you can feel it more at your leisure when I am once up. Make haste, I beseech you.”

“ Oh, what a beautiful bushy tail. Never did I feel such a tail ! ”

“ It is entirely at your service, sweet Griffiness,” said the Fox ; “ but pray let me in. Why lose an instant ? ”

“ No, never did I feel such a tail. No wonder you are so successful with the ladies.”

“ Ah, beloved Griffiness, my tail is yours to eternity, but you pinch it a little too hard.”

Scarcely had he said this, when down dropped the basket, but not with the Fox in it; he found himself caught by the tail, and dangling half way down the rock, by the help of the very same sort of pulley wherewith he had snared the Dog. I leave you to guess his consternation; he yelped out as loud as he could,—for it hurts a Fox exceedingly to be hanged by his tail with his head downwards,—when the door of the rock opened, and out stalked the Griffin himself, smoking his pipe, with a vast crowd of all the fashionable beasts in the neighbourhood.

“ Oho, brother,” said the Bear, laughing fit to kill himself, “ who ever saw a fox hanged by the tail before ? ”

“ You’ll have need of a physician,” quoth Doctor Ape.

“ A pretty match, indeed; a Griffiness for such a creature as you,” said the Goat strutting by him.

The Fox grinned with pain, and said nothing. But that which hurt him most was the compassion of a dull fool of a Donkey, who assured him with great gravity, that he saw nothing at all to laugh at in his situation!

"At all events," said the Fox at last, "cheated, gulled, betrayed as I am, I have played the same trick to the Dog, go and laugh at him, gentlemen, he deserves it as much as I can, I assure you."

"Pardon me," said the Griffin, taking the pipe out of his mouth; "one never laughs at the honest."

"And see," said the Bear, "here he is."

And indeed the Dog had, after much effort, gnawed the string in two, and extricated his paw; the scent of the Fox had enabled him to track his footsteps, and here he arrived, burning for vengeance and finding himself already avenged.

But his first thought was for his dear cousin. "Ah, where is she," he cried movingly; "without doubt that villain Reynard has served her some scurvy trick."

"I fear so indeed, my old friend," answered the Griffin, "but don't grieve; after all she was nothing particular. You shall marry my daughter the Griffiness, and succeed to all the treasure, ay, and all the bones that you once guarded so faithfully."

"Talk not to me," said the faithful Dog. "I want none of your treasure, and, though I don't mean to be rude, your Griffiness may go to the devil. I will run over the world but I will find my dear cousin."

"See her then," said the Griffin; and the beautiful Cat, more beautiful than ever, rushed out of the cavern and threw herself into the Dog's paws.

A pleasant scene this for the Fox!—he knew enough of the female heart to know that a soft tongue may excuse many little infidelities,—but to be boiled alive for a Griffin's soup!—no, the offence was inexpiable!

“You understand me, Mr. Reynard,” said the Griffin, “I have no daughter, and it was me you made love to. Knowing what sort of a creature a Magpie is, I amused myself with hoaxing her,—the fashionable amusement at court, you know.”

The Fox made a mighty struggle, and leaped on the ground, leaving his tail behind him. It did not grow again in a hurry.

“See,” said the Griffin, as the beasts all laughed at the figure Reynard made running into the wood, “the Dog beats the Fox, with the ladies, after all; and cunning as he is in every thing else, the Fox is the last creature that should ever think of making love!”

“Charming,” cried Nymphalin, clasping her hands, “it is just the sort of story I like.”

“And I suppose, sir,” said Nip, pertly, “that the Dog and the Cat lived very happily ever afterwards. Indeed the married felicity of a Dog and Cat is proverbial!”

“I dare say they lived much the same as any other married couple,” answered the Prince.
